Notes:

Robert Schumann, String Quartet No. 3 in A Major, Op. 41, No. 3

Robert Schumann tended to compose in short, concentrated bursts, intensively focused on one genre at a time. 1842 became his “year of chamber music” where he miraculously produced three string quartets, the glorious piano quintet and the equally superb piano quartet. Schumann wrote his three string quartets, Op. 41, in a space of five weeks with the third dashed off in only a few days. His letters and journals demonstrate his methodical preparation by studying the quartets of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven including the latter’s “late quartets” with which Schumann was particularly enthralled. The bulk of Mendelssohn’s quartets predate Op. 41 and Schumann was without a doubt familiar with them as well as quartets of lesser composers that he would have reviewed as a founding critic for the important journal Neue Zeitschrift für Musik. Indeed, Schumann dedicated Op. 41 to his friend and contemporary, Felix Mendelssohn. History has since highlighted the first and third of the quartets with the String Quartet in A Major, Op. 41, No 3 becoming the favourite.

The opening movement in sonata form is rather delicate and subtle with tempo and character directions like “espressivo” and “molto moderato.” It begins with a short, dreamy introduction that establishes a signature motive heard at least four times: a falling perfect fifth like a sensuous sigh. Schumann clouds the key signature with expressive modulations leading to a pregnant pause full of dramatic tension. But the main exposition ensues with a gentle calmness, defying this opening feint with a grazioso character. The clear-cut form features two main themes with a floating sequential bridge passage in between. A short but turbulent development section concerns itself primarily with the first theme broken in half: the falling fifth and its scurrying counterpart juxtaposed. The movement ends quietly with a fully resolved final falling fifth in the cello.

Schumann supplies a theme and variations for the second movement, an alternative to the usual scherzo. The first three variations are terse, agitated and dark leading to the fourth variation, a much more lyrical canon between the violin and viola recalling Schubert. Some commentators suggest this is a novel arrangement comprising a theme preceded by three variations. The fifth variation resumes the turbulent thematic reduction while a coda changes the mood entirely with a shift to the major mode and a serene conclusion.

The third movement Adagio is the longest and most profound movement of the quartet revealing Schumann’s characteristic lyricism and rhapsodic romanticism. A heartwarming song-like theme is quickly confounded by a second, fragmentary and angst-ridden idea threatening to drown the song in the dramatic chaos of a plodding march. The intermittent surges and swells settle back into warm lyricism as the insistent march softens and fades into the third mild conclusion of the quartet.

Typical for Schumann, the finale sweeps away all that has gone before in a surge of kinetic vitality with a grand conclusion. A crisply delineated sectional form gives Schumann ample room for a variety of musical ideas in what Melvin Berger calls “the apotheosis of rondo form.” Several small episodes are arranged around the recurring refrain to make the symmetrical form characteristic of the classical rondo crowned with a coda expanding the realization of the finale refrain. One is reminded of Schumann’s penchant for pageantry exposing a gallery of contrasting characters including his famous literary duality of Florestan and Eusebius. So ends Schumann’s only set of string quartets, essentially the last word in the genre before Brahms.

Kelly-Marie Murphy, “Oblique Light” for string quartet (2016)

Oblique Light was commissioned by the Penderecki String Quartet for their 2016/17 concert season. It was written to honour Canada’s sesquicentennial year.

Canada is geographically huge with a relatively small population. It spans from Atlantic to Pacific to Arctic. As part of a military family, I was lucky enough to live in many different parts of the country, moving every three years throughout my childhood. For this quartet, I concentrated on how we experience light in a Northern climate. It can be in sharp focus or very nebulous. It can even be almost absent during short winter days or severe summer storms. If you are standing on the open prairie on a summer day, the sunlight is sharp and intense; if you are in the mountains on powder snow with the sun reflecting off, the light is blinding; if you are looking up through the leaves of an old-growth forest, the light is diffused; if you are looking through the spray of ocean’s waves, or river’s rapids, the light is hazy. Ice makes light bend in unusual ways. This is all part of my Canadian experience, and I hope will continue to be. – Kelly-Marie Murphy

Franz Schubert Quintet for Strings in C Major, D.956 (1828)

Franz Schubert was spell-bound by his contemporary Goethe. Schubert set parts of Goethe’s Faust to music in his well-known lieder ‘Gretchen at the spinning-wheel’ (1814) as well over eighty settings of sixty-four of Goethe’s poems, many of them now classics in the Lieder repertoire. Goethe completed Faust in 1832, the last year of his life, shortly after Schubert’s death in 1828. Schubert’s last years were marked by ill-health and depression spurred on by the Napoleonic invasions in Vienna and the ensuing death of the Viennese culture he once knew. Schubert’s C Major Quintet, completed two months before his death in 1828, is a sprawling masterpiece that occupies this dark world and delves deeply into the composer’s psyche. But here as well is the Gretchen-Faust dilemma of eternity vs. death and divine beauty vs. decadence. Sensitivity to beauty both fulfills and exacts an exorbitant price. Eugene Ionesco has written:

Beauty is a precarious trace that eternity causes to appear to us and that it takes away from us. A manifestation of eternity, and a sign of death as well. Often it seems to me to be an evil flower of nothingness, or else the cry of the world as it dies, or a desperate, sumptuous prayer. (Present Past Past Present, 1968)

More than almost any other composer, Schubert expressed the innocence and terror of beauty. From the very opening of the C-Major Quintet, the harmony is the very embodiment of stability and purity, and yet it decays immediately and exposes a harsh dissonance, then turns back to the opening harmony, now suddenly stripped of its innocence. This type of Faustian bitter-sweet fate is key to understanding Schubert and his magnificent quintet for strings.

Now based in Waterloo, Ontario where they have been Quartet-in-Residence at Wilfrid Laurier University since 1991, The Penderecki String Quartet has become one of the most celebrated chamber ensembles of their generation. The four Penderecki musicians (now originating from Poland, Canada, and USA) bring their varied yet collective experience to create performances that demonstrate their “remarkable range of technical excellence and emotional sweep” (Toronto, Globe and Mail).

The PSQ’s international performing schedule has included appearances in New York (Weill Recital Hall at Carnegie Hall), Amsterdam (Concertgebouw), Hong Kong (Academy for the Arts), Los Angeles (REDCAT Hall at Disney Center), St. Petersburg (Sheremetev Palace), the Adam Festival in New Zealand, and throughout Europe in Rome, Madrid, Paris, Belgrade, Prague, Krakow, Vilnius, and Zagreb.
